INTRODUCTION.

SOME years ago the writer was impressed with the rapid rate of disappearance of the externally situated memorial inscriptions in the City of London to its dead citizens. This has been due to two main causes, viz. : the action of the atmospheric elements and the sacrilegists who, while believing themselves Christians, think that, by statute, consecration may be undone and that that which has been dedicated to God may well be allocated to the mundane purposes of street widening and office building. On the whole the latter cause has effected the greater destruction, for it must be remembered that the custom of erecting memorials over the graves of the dead, when buried outside the church, is of comparatively recent favour, and the sordid tampering with consecrated ground has taken place in this city rather extensively from time to time since the custom referred to has been favoured. However, at the time the writer's mind was moved on the subject, the greater destructive influence was that of atmospheric conditions, for in recent years very few street alterations, etc., necessitating obliteration of consecrated ground have been carried out, and in the absence of this, public feeling has of late been strongly inclined to retention of all open spaces for hygienic reasons. The latter has, in fact, been carried to such an extent that in many cases the ground has been laid out for public use as gardens and places of public recreation, peaceful perhaps, but unfortunately too often used by the dirty loafer and those that work not. Nevertheless, the antiquary should be thankful for this public feeling, because, although, in many cases, in furtherance of the conversion, burial memorials, in the absence of special control by relatives of those commemorated, have had to be subservient to the exigencies of horticulture, yet the memorials have not been destroyed. The atmosphere of such a large city as London is naturally heavily charged with the emanations of civilisation, such as coal combustion products, comprising acidulous matter peculiarly destructive of materials such as limestone and marble, of which most burial memorials are made in the South of England. To such an extent is this destructive influence apparent that after the dry spring and summer of 1899, during which acidulous matter was deposited upon all the buildings of our city, the writer observed, during the first heavy autumnal storm of that year, the frothy ebullition upon the limestone walls of a city church due to the action of the diluted acid upon the carbonate of lime of the structure. Impressed with these considerations, and having a feeling of veneration and affection towards those worthy citizens lying in their narrow beds amidst all the sordid bustle and scenes they probably loved so well, the writer felt that it was a task worthy of his labour to turn "Old Mortality" for the time and faithfully record these fast disappearing memorials. The task was far greater than he imagined, but having entered upon it, he continued it to completion, taking care to transcribe every word and cipher possible, sparing neither patience nor soiling of hands and clothes in the work. Every transcript was made line for line, and even the style of lettering was copied in nearly all cases.

It was that found even at that time there still remained memorial inscriptions to the dead in no less than fifty-nine open spaces within the City, a few of the spaces really comprising burial grounds belonging to more than one parish. The majority of these grounds were closed to the general public and some had evidently only been entered at rare intervals. This exclusiveness had evidently, as well it might, disheartened well intentioned antiquaries in the past from doing the work that ought to have been carried out sixty years ago. It was undoubtedly the cause of more than half the labour and personal inconvenience expended and experienced by the writer in his task, entailing much correspondence, great delays and many attendances, although he acknowledges with pleasure the great courtesy that he generally experienced at the hands of incumbents and parochial officers. Destructive influences in the past had also been so great that the number of legible inscriptions was much less than the number of burial grounds in which they were distributed would lead one to suppose, and evidently in very small proportion to those existing when the grounds were closed for burials. After weeks of correspondence, in order to ascertain the officer who could give the copyist admittance to a little ground, it was found, perhaps, that there were but two inscriptions existing in it.

Although in the absence of help which is not forthcoming it is not possible to publish the complete transcripts of the epitaphs of the dead citizens of the greatest city of the world, yet it is found practicable to print abstracts of all of them, as is done in the following pages. These abstracts comprising, as they do, all facts stated in the inscriptions of any use to the genealogist, will, it is believed, be found very useful by him and by the antiquary generally. Moreover, the abstracts should be of interest to the citizen, and he is not uncommon, who even in these days of speed and suburban domicile is inclined to linger over the memories of those who in the past have helped to make our City what it is and who lived their life, experienced their joys and sorrows and died amidst the scenes that many City men now only couple with caretakers and ledgers. It may by some be considered morbid to linger on the memories of the dead or to live in the past at all, but it is not so. Mental journeys of this kind have a refining and civilizing influence as is proved by the fact that never at any time heretofore has the desire for identification and knowledge of particular ancestors, that is the study of genealogy, been stronger than it is to-day, when physically every thing appears superficially to be for future. The truth is that the mind, particularly that of high development, loves to dwell on the past at times—its joys are gilded and its sorrows whitened. It is the unknown future that appals. These feelings permeate all society, and the writer was once publicly and spontaneously thanked by a “labouring” man for transcribing burial inscriptions.

Since the writer’s transcripts were made, many of the inscriptions have become illegible, or have disappeared, so that at the present time it is impossible to do the same work. The writer only regrets that he was not able to transcribe the inscriptions many years earlier, say at the time the City burial grounds were closed, about sixty years ago.

A curious instance of how conditions counteract automatically is afforded by the changes in the City. Prior to 1852, the population was so close that it was decided that City burial grounds should be closed to burials for hygienic reasons, and statutory provision was made accordingly, whereas in a very few years the density of population brought about its own remedy, for the area became too valuable for residential purposes. At the present time the resident population of the City is so much smaller that the old burial grounds would be ample burial accommodation without producing conditions any more unwholesome than those brought about by the vast cemeteries to which burials were transferred.

Those inquirers who are not well acquainted with London, must bear in mind that the City proper, being the locality covered by this work, forms now a very small portion of the great metropolis, although the most ancient, interesting and important portion. To copy all the monumental inscriptions of London County would take almost a lifetime, and the writer must leave that task, not, he hopes, to a single labourer, but to many. He himself some years ago transcribed the greater number of those in Clerkenwell and Southwark.

That monumental inscriptions afford valuable data to the genealogist, not ascertainable from Parish Registers, every student of such things knows. Relationships, ages, locality of origin, or residence, are frequently given, and to the inquirer constitute valuable links and guides to further search. Moreover such inscriptions constitute a good check to Parish Registers at times, for the occasional inconsistencies between the two records are not always due to errors on the memorials. In fact there are instances, although rare, of omission of burial entries in Registers when it is patent that the remains still rest in the burial ground of the parish.

It may be noted that many of the Monumental Inscriptions which were externally situated when copied had originally been placed in the floors of the churches, but had been removed later to the outside elements to make room for the execrable pottery so much favoured for floors a few years ago. This practice of removal cannot, in the writer's opinion, be too heartily condemned, for it immediately subjects to severe destructive agencies memorials that were never intended to be so exposed by the loving friends who inscribed the stones. There is, notwithstanding the modern tendency to fear morbidity, nothing incongruous in the presence of memorials to the dead in buildings so closely connected with the mystery of human existence as places of worship.

The reader may discern occasionally in the following abstracts slight obscurities in statements of relationship, but these obscurities exist in the original inscriptions, for every care has been taken to make the abstracts exactly consistent with the originals.

In conclusion the writer thanks all the clergy and other parish officers, too numerous to name, for their courtesy and trouble in affording facilities for making the transcripts.
